Another of the tools that sysadmin could use to thwart would-be hackers is to create a Password database with all the Passwords that you use (or want to use). Then create a script to systematically try each of your Passwords, to make sure that a password that you think is safe is actually quite weak. Like this -- Gmail has been the most used e-mail service and password hacking on Gmail users is second to no other. If you use Gmail, be sure to employ good Password practices because a hacker who steals your username and Password is much more likely to get into other websites that you use on a regular basis. If you use a compromised Gmail account, your e-mail address and password are immediately available for a potential hacker to access, which means a hacker can gain access to all of your other accounts. Hackers have even been known to steal data from Google's servers and sell that data for profit. Imposing a security policy is only part of the solution. Protecting users from all sorts of cybersecurity threats is only part of the solution. To be safe, users have to be the biggest part of the solution. As Maklakov and others point out, the best way to deal with a password hacking attack is to patch the problem as soon as it is discovered, rather than waiting until you are hacked. The Internet is a fast-paced place and hackers and bad actors are constantly looking for new ways into devices and systems, be they ours or those of others. Often, a password hacking attack happens while you are distracted by another issue.

to make a long story short, we can only tell you to use your password wisely. password security is a matter of who you are communicating with. for example, if you know a particular hacker, you can make a good guess about their techniques, and see if the password can be cracked using the set of techniques that they use. similarly, if you know the specifics of the environment you are trying to protect, you can eliminate whole classes of attack, and focus on the ones that are left. gmail's rules for password security are quite simple. unlike the systems used by other email services, gmail does not limit the number of characters that can be used, or require a complex set of rules to be used. gmail simply says that you can use any combination of the following characters: lowercase letters, uppercase letters, numbers, and special characters. most people follow the rules above. i am not a security expert, and i can't predict how long it will take a hacker to break a password in your case. as such, i don't want to make any strong recommendations. however, i can tell you that gmail's password security is quite easy to break, and should be fixed. in your case, you are dealing with a hacker who is just trying to guess your password. if you are sharing your password with a lot of other people, you can consider re-using a more secure password. gmail's rules are as simple as can be. as a result, they are incredibly easy to break. if you use numbers, make sure they are difficult to guess. if you use numbers, make sure they are at least 8 characters long. if you are using numbers and words, make sure that the words don't contain numbers. the hacker has only about 65,000 combinations to try, which is enough to crack your password in a matter of minutes. 5ec8ef588b
