before we move forward, one issue that needs clarification is the use of the term "solidworks". this article uses solidworks as a collective term that includes all of the following: design: solidworks is a highly sophisticated full-featured cad/cam program that is used by many companies and governments to design models of a variety of products and then manufacture them. solution: solidworks is a cad/cam solution that allows a non-cad/cam user (such as a physician or clinic) to create models without being trained in computer-aided design or computer-aided manufacturing. that is, the solution offers a workflow solution to create models using tools that most people are familiar with. a "solidworks" solution is different than a "3d printing" solution. cad/cam: cad/cam refers to computer-aided design and computer-aided manufacturing. solidworks is a product that allows a user to design models using those tools. cad/cam is a workflow process that guides the user through the steps required to produce a model for manufacturing. solidworks uses the term "block" when it comes to 3d model manipulation. this term usually means to create a 2d or 2.5d model of an object. 3d models are usually used to visualize 3d shapes of objects. in some cases, 3d models may even be used to visualize the working mechanism of machines, such as the one used in the solidworks photo above. in this article, we use the term "block" to describe the finished model of the m-ptas. we will use "component" to describe smaller models that are made from blocks, such as an armature and a mechanical coupling. 5ec8ef588b
